This was a fun contemporary chic-lit. It was a pretty fast read and had some fun witty characters. I know everyone is saying in their reviews that they love Grandpa(I read several before I actually picked up the book). I was really trying not to say that and say something original but I really can't help myself and not say it...so Grandpa was awesome! There I said it!! enjoyed the characters and reading further into the story really learning about who they are because at the beginning of the book you have a great setup that makes you have some preconceived notions about who these characters are and that they are probably not going to be characters that you will like. So I enjoyed the way that the author slowly revealed little bits and pieces about the two MCs, Legend and Charity, so that the reader along with the characters realize that those preconceived notions weren't right. I'll let you read it yourself to see what you think about these characters and if your original thoughts changed towards them or not.Both Legend and Charity have dreams and those dreams haven't come without heartache and lots of time and devotion. Yet Charity has lost hers due to up and coming Legend James, number one draft pick of the season, saying that she lied in an article she wrote about him. She of course loses her new upcoming job at The New York Times. Legend is furious that Charity could write what she wrote about it and so he decides to pay a visit to her. According to this book, Fate was guiding everything. :-))When Legend confronts her, Charity receives a phone call informing her that her grandfather has just had a stroke and is in the Park City hospital. Unfortunately(or rather fortunately-or fate-unately) Charity doesn't have a working vehicle to get to the hospital.
